Legal Opinions...

SILENCE AS A POWER AND A RIGHT

"In the sweet territory of silence we touch the mystery. It's the place of reflection and contemplation, and it's the place where we can connect with the deep knowing, to the deep wisdom way."

— Angeles Arrien quoted in The Millionth Circleby Jean Shinoda Bolen

Silence is both powerful as well as a significant quality and a weapon that an individual can possess. The first skilltaught in the path of spirituality and meditation of any form is to master the art of being calm and silent. It is often preached by monks that "the challenge is to find calm in the crowd" and "god gave us two ears but a single mouth".

Modern day therapies also focus on meditation techniques and there is no denial of the fact that meditation is gaining a lot of popularity. A silent person preserves a lot of energy is another inescapable truth. The Constitution of India, 1950 guarantees to every citizen the right to freedom of speech and expression (Article 19(1)(a)). However, it should be noted that the right to freedom of speech and expression includes the right to remain silent (Bijoe Emmanuel v. State of Kerala). Further, Article 20(3) of The Constitution of India, 1950protects an accused against self-incrimination. In Sujit Biswas v. State of Assam, the honorable Supreme Court of India held that “the accused has the right to remain silent, as he cannot be forced to become a witness against himself”.

Another noteworthy provision which provides the right to remain silent to an accused is section 313(3) of CrPC.

The intricate nexus of Intellectual Property rights, Information Technology and legal framework

The widespread availability of digital technology has allowed for the dissemination of information at a rate and with a degree of accuracy that was before impossible.

The extensive use of the Internet and other types of electronic media have shown to be a successful and efficient technique of distribution when it comes to spreading works of literature, art, or science to a large audience.

On the other hand, it prompts several issues that need to be considered some of which include the following:

- I. Whether or not digitalization is analogous to replication?
- II. Is the process of digitising anything similar to the logical process of translating from one language to another?
- III. Should commercial distribution or public communication like broadcasting of digital materials through the Internet be considered?

- IV. Is the exhaustion of the distribution right concept still relevant in the information age?
- V. Is it reasonable to see a database as a particular collected work deserving of copyright protection, or is it more reasonable to treat it as a special work that requires special laws for its preservation?
- VI. What does "Faire usage" mean in the context of the World Wide Web?
- VII. What are the record keeping patrons worried about?
- VIII. How can the public practise fair usage with respect to such works in the digital arena if the copyright owner may technologically limit access?
- IX. Should record keepers be barred from using digital technology to create three copies (an archive copy, a master copy, and a use copy) to ensure the longevity of works?
- X. Whether or not organisations that provide Internet access (such as schools and corporate offices) should be held legally responsible for a user's violation of another's intellectual property rights simply because they enabled the transfer of digital data (binary digits) that ultimately became that creator's copyrighted creation.

All these are unique to the internet world and are we as the legal fraternity prepared to combat them effectively?
